

William Potts-Datema

William Potts-Datema serves as Chief of the Program Development and Services Branch of the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention Division of Adolescent and School Health.

Bill has worked in education and public health for 24 years including service from local to national levels. He has worked with Federal agencies national non-governmental organizations and state governments nationwide to improve health and educational outcomes for children and youth.

Bill holds Master of Science and Bachelor of Science in Education degrees from Missouri State University and he has completed other graduate coursework at the Harvard School of Public Health and Kennedy School of Government. He has presented in 48 states and six other nations and he has authored and contributed to a number of publications. Bill and his wife Susan have four children. Aside from his family he lives for baseball season.